Meeting with Dr Anne Singleton ECMR, University of Sydney and Cancer voice NSW representative Jill. Having an exciting discussion about HRQOL among people living with cancer.

It was so exciting to attend the first NSW Cancer conference. This was also my first conference with regard to cancer research. It has been a great opportunity to present the preliminary findings of my study through a poster. I received very useful comments on our findings from relevant stakeholders including expert researchers and consumers. These comments will surely help to generate impactful outcomes from my research and also provides directions for further studies.

As an early career researcher and relatively new in cancer research, this conference provided a great opportunity to build up a new research network and future collaborative research opportunities. For example, I have developed connections with some consumers which will really help to design a further study with the involvement of consumers. I have had a nice discussion with some cancer survivorship researchers about the potential grant application for a project with a combination of my biostatistical expertise along with their survivorship expertise.

Take home message: Attending local conferences like the NSW cancer conference is effective in building a strong connection (with consumers, research experts, policymakers and other stakeholders) for cutting-edge research output that can make difference in people's life.

I acknowledge the Sydney Cancer Partners for providing registration support to attend this conference.
