The NSW Cancer Conference was an enjoyable experience. I displayed a poster presenting my PhD project, which I hope was educational and inspiring for any researcher who came across it. A highlight of the conference for me was the presentations and the panel discussions. My favourite presentation was by Kara Perrow as I thought it was really creative and interesting how she is targeting pancreatic cancer from the inside-out, using implants that slowly release chemotherapeutic agents. My favourite panel discussion was the discussion titled ‘social justice and equity in cancer care delivery for priority populations, from screening through to survivorship, including access to clinical trials’. It was interesting to hear about how intersectionality comes into cancer care and how clinicians must take into account one’s many overlapping identities, including that of their sexuality, gender, culture and ethnicity. I thought the venue was great and the catering was fantastic.
